

Europe is Committing suicide

by Jan Matys

The popular biologist Václav Větvíčka has published an article with the above title, in which he breaks one taboo – the principle that human life is sacred and must be saved in any situation. Humanitarian organizations send food aid to underdeveloped countries and rescue human lives there. The imported food often gets into hands of resellers, who sell it cheap, and so they drive the local producers out of the market. Such country then ceases to be self-reliant in food¹.

The rescued people get into a desperate situation – they cannot come into their own in their country and find themselves in refuge camps. The young men are often recruited by various terrorist groups, or they try to get into advanced countries in various ways; however, the coronavirus has crossed their plans.

“In this situation the “war against terrorism”, declared by American president, is lacking any sense: we are fighting against people which we have rescued from hunger and death. There are three challenges standing before Europeans – the climate crisis, the coronavirus epidemic and the migration from overpopulated regions. In any case, we should be modest and conserve the remaining part of our nature.

P.S. There is a similar problem in our gypsy ghettos – children is their money. They live of the state “relief aid”².
